All good things

Taking a dated property from bland to grand is no mean feat. Here's how one couple successfully transformed their house into a bright and welcoming home ▶ hat started out as a basement and kitchen project fairly quickly turned into a whole-house renovation for Nola Donachie and Nick Swinburne. They had already been living in the property for a couple of years before works started and knew what they were happy with and what definitely needed to go. Nola and Nick worked closely with Qualitas Construction to create a home that's low maintenance as well as modern, significantly changing the way their family use the rooms in the house. Major work included extending out into the side return to create a light and airy open-plan space for the new kitchen-diner. Here, Nola tells us more about the project...

Was it difficult to create a brief?

Having lived in the house for so long, I had quite a distinct idea of what I wanted. The interiors were very beige, and I wanted to change this with strong colours and wallpaper. We worked with interior designer Nicola Hicks to help us bring everything together. For example, she advised us which walls to choose if we wanted to use a certain type of wallpaper, and also let us know which type of paint would work with it. That was invaluable, because although we had a lot of ideas about what we wanted to do, bringing it together on our own would have been a huge task.

How did you choose your kitchen design?

Our kitchen came from a local company called Eclectic Interiors, and the team there were fabulous – particularly Jolanta Harradine, whose attention to detail was second to none. She pushed us to have approximately four fairly long sessions with her to get the design right. The space is similar to what we had before, but the old island was way too big and just dominated. Getting rid of that and replacing it with a smaller version has made a huge difference to how the room feels. We have a new induction hob, and because I've always used gas I was a bit reticent. However, I've found there are definitely no down sides – it's easier to clean, heats evenly across the pan and is very user friendly.

What were you looking to achieve in the master bedroom?

I wanted somewhere that was a happy, positive place to wake up in, as well as adding some colour to the space. The vibrant green wallpaper does both of those things for me. I also wanted to have shutters that would allow light into the room while still giving us privacy. The colour on the shutters is matched to the wardrobes, skirting, and window frames to bring the décor together. In general, we tried to keep furniture to a minimum so the room didn't feel cluttered.

How did you decide on the scheme for the bathroom?

Our brief was to create a space where we could relax, and which was a natural continuation of the bedroom. The finished room feels a bit like a luxury hotel, with the wall-hung vanity unit, large mirror, and two countertop basins. There is also a generous bath and spacious ▶ ↖ Engineered timber floors have been laid in a herringbone pattern. Nola initially thought it would look too traditional, but now she loves the resulting modern finish.

↑ Despite the open-plan space's size, the cooking area is compact and easy to navigate. Nola is particularly pleased with her new induction hob.

✓ The previous décor was dull and overwhelmingly beige, so Nola and Nick were determined to include plenty of bold patterns and colour.

walk-in shower. To store all our bathroom essentials out of sight, shelves and a hanging space are cleverly tucked away behind sliding doors next to the vanity unit.

Did you make any U-turns during the project?

We went into this thinking it would be a basement and kitchen project – but then, as time went on, we would be walking around the rooms spotting other things that needed to be done. We ended up refurbishing the whole house. One aspect Nicola and my husband changed my mind about was parquet flooring in the kitchen. I originally thought it would look too old fashioned. But Nicola told us about a place in Fulham called Cheville, which offers engineered wood planks that are quite contemporary, and that's what we chose.

Any advice to share?

We were fortunate to work with Qualitas, and while our project manager was very busy running multiple projects, he always got back to us. We never had that feeling of being at the back of the queue. I'd also advise people to be open to employing an interior designer. Nicola really ended up paying for herself, as she helped us choose furniture and got us discounts, too. Overall, the whole project has been a really positive experience. ▶

Q&A

Architect Jonathan Woodcock of Qualitas says...

What was your brief?

To create a light, airy and open space – so we opened up the ground floor out into the side return using structural steels.

What elements took up the majority of the budget?

One large expense on this project was the glazing. Crittall external doors were fitted on the ground floor and the basement to the garden and rear lightwell respectively.

Biggest challenge with the project?

This property was located next to a block of post-war flats, the foundations of which were adjacent to our new underpins. It was imperative that works were carried out in a particular sequence to avoid any disaster.

What advice do you give clients on finding contractors?

It is always important to seek recommendations from neighbours and friends who have recently undertaken work. And don't always go on price – at the end of the day, expertise and a high-quality finish are more important.

↑ The master bedroom is a bright, creative, and bold space. A contemporary wallpaper brings a feeling of freshness into the sleeping area.

← Two steps mark the divide between the dining area and the playroom beyond and help zone the spaces.

→ The spacious master ensuite is easy to maintain and the neutral two-tone palette gives it a spa-like appeal.

→ A Bisque towel radiator, cleverly positioned above the bath for ease of use, complements the brassware. Mounting the shower screen straight onto the tiled floor creates a step-free enclosure.

The wall-mounted vanity unit allows for easy cleaning and offers practical storage for toiletries. The oversized mirror and two basins mean the couple can get ready at the same time.
