

Home again to England

It was like a fast-action video game acted out in real-time: The French Connection with a faster car. I watched in horror as we zig-zagged back and forth across three lanes, powering on past a sprinkling of vehicles out for a Sunday drive. Glancing across at the speedo caused even more alarm: 140 miles per hour! Twice the limit and faster than I had ever been on four wheels!

A signboard flashed by, indicating a service stop ahead. Trying to sound as nonchalant as possible, but having to shout so I could be heard above the scream of the engine, I called out to the driver:

“Hey Mike, could we stop for a bite? I’m famished after the flight; the food on board was crap.” It was not true, but I would say anything to escape this high velocity merry-go-motorway, even if only for brief respite.

“Sure George, sure,” he quipped back to me, swinging over to the left lane and releasing his foot from the gas, the exhaust burbling excitedly, as we powered down towards the legal speed ... and the exit lane.

I was returning to live in England, the country of my birth, after more than thirty years down under, in Australia. During the previous year, there had been a visit by myself and family to check out the scene. Now I was the frontrunner, returning to the fold for good: a scout tracking ahead, to arrange safe landing for the main posse.

During the previous year I had met with Michael – not Schumacher, though perhaps that's who he thought he was - after applying for a job with his English learning academy. Mike was in fact my boss. The academy was a one-man show (my inclusion made it two) and the interview turned into a longer-than-planned beer drinking session, which we both drove away from, distinctly under the influence and certainly over the limit. My job, like the academy was a bit of a scam and involved teaching English, on a one-to-one basis, to a young boy from an extremely well-healed South Korean family. Teaching took place at a most prestigious (and therefore exceedingly expensive) private school for boys in Cheltenham Spa, home to a handful of education institutions for the elite and the well-endowed, whether that be British aristocracy or South Korean nouveau riche.

As well as being a formidable consumer of beer, I found that Mike was also severely addicted to nicotine. He also taught foreign students on a one-to-one basis at the same hallowed halls, and when our time-tables permitted, we would meet for a cigarette-smoking challenge, washed down with bottomless cups of thick, black coffee, whilst looking towards the main gate of the austere college which paid our way, from a vantage point in a rather exclusive coffee shop, across the street.

They were fun times, until I found out that my boss was screwing the rather cute (and extremely wealthy) mother of my young student. The subterfuge that Mike had to go employ to maintain his pursuit of this Korean lady meant that I was often left alone for the coffee breaks ... or if and when he turned up, the coffee breaks would turn into a rant from him, about his dealings with her. All this, of course, had to be kept from the son – my innocent young pupil - though at times I got the feeling that the young lad knew more than he let on. It was without doubt, an intriguing return to my homeland.

The last I heard of Mike, was of him attempting to resist arrest whilst being hauled off a 747 Jumbo in Hong Kong, charged with smoking in the toilet. A fascinating guy who lived life to the extreme and looked destined to die young because of it ... either behind the wheel of a Lamborghini, or from dramatic failure of liver and lung!

Mike earned a bomb from the Eton-esque school; but paid me peanuts. That was not the case with a summer-school position I managed to secure, teaching English to visiting students, who arrived each year from a girl's high school in Tokyo. The job was a dream: one hundred, fifteen-year-old girls divided into ten classes; thus ten girls per class; five days a week; four lessons a day; sports in the afternoons and three separate, day-long excursions, to the Dreaming Spires of Oxford, Shakespeare's Stratford and the Roman baths in Bath. At the end of the three-week heist, we gathered for a staff party where pay-packets were handed out in brown paper envelopes ... no questions asked! Brilliant!

For those few balmy summer months after returning, my English scouting operation appeared to be going well. Then the summer schools finished, and Mike disappeared, reported in dispatches to be living with a wealthy lady in Seoul. My long-lost family flew in from the antipodes and found me high and dry, without any income. My partner had pre-arranged a job before arrival, but England was by no means the cheapest of places to live, so it was imperative that I should help to bolster the household coffers too.

It wasn't long before I stumbled on a local group whose work was aligned to the development field and resembled in some ways what I had been doing in Australia, the main difference being that while my previous links had been with India, the new group was connected to Kenya. More specifically, they linked to the Far West of that country and had facilitated a township link between Cheltenham and the third biggest urban area: a town on the shores of Lake Victoria, called Kisumu.

This Cheltenham-based organization, named Rendezvous - run by a self-centred man whom I came, with time, to detest – had a fascinating range of enterprises, with a mini-Oxfam style shop at street level, a cosy café down below and rooms above, for offices and meeting space. With my experience in the same world from Australia, I soon became involved in their work and before long went about developing a subdivision for schools, as part of the overall effort. Suddenly, I was back in the world of Global Education and overseas development. It seemed my destiny to be there.

For the first time, I launched into the idea of three-way links, managing to create a Kenya – UK – India triangle for schools - grounded and building on the original outreach work from Australia – not long after beginning work at Rendezvous. This meant reconnecting to previous partners, now old friends, based in Mumbai. As it transpired, the triangular country/continent formation became a feature of all the work I was associated with, for the next ten years. From schools we moved to include universities and after that, community youth. This meant our main target groups (loosely termed youth) could be anywhere in the age range from five to twenty-five years, coming from any of three countries, and representing any of three continents.

The man who headed up the Cheltenham group was an interesting study in ideology and obtuse survival tactics, rolled together to consume everything and everyone he touched. This was way before Jeremy Corbyn hit the headlines as leader of the British Labour Party, but the two could have been soul mates, even twins, because they looked and sounded almost identical, each in their late sixties, within juxtaposed generations. It was an eerie experience for me, as I watched Jezza destroy Labour, through sheer pigheadedness, much as Denis from Cheltenham had made a total mess of running his Rendezvous organization. Like Corbyn he was a man with a smattering of devotees, but one whom the majority had little time for. I too fell into the latter bracket for both.

And it was his organization, for Denis was the founder, president, secretary, and treasurer, all rolled into one, with a puppet committee that hardly ever met and even when it did, would bend to his wishes. There was one memorable night - after our initial friendship had started to sour and things in general were beginning to fall apart for Denis too - at an Annual General Meeting of perhaps 30 or 40 people, when the once-exalted leader became so irate he ended up chasing a couple of committee members down the stairs, out the front door and along the street outside: an incredible sight!

It wasn't long after that, when I realised things were going way off-track and began to separate my affairs from those of Rendezvous. Denis, of course, was dead against that, pursuing both me and a new associate of mine with never-ending zeal. It took a full two years, which incorporated a raft of accusations – all unfounded – before we were able to completely sever the ties. I came to recognize this as a much-too-common trait amongst Non-Government Organisations (NGOs) and charities the world over - to be controlled and operated, often on the borders of legality, by one person – and a few years later had to deal with something very similar, but in a Kenyan setting.

The new associate, John Davidson, helped enormously to enable a break-away from the clutches of Rendezvous. He was a formidable character whom, at first, even Denis was a bit hesitant to confront (though after a while he overcame those inhibitions, and went about trying to make life as equally uncomfortable for both of us, as he possibly could). My first encounter with John – the man who would come to be my colleague and mentor - came after I spotted him at a local community meeting, reporting back on alleged improper dealings by one of the Rendezvous offshoot organisations. My main interest in his report was to see how the spin-off group would fair. They had been subjected to the same treatment, by Rendezvous (which in fact meant, by Denis) as I was now suffering, which from my viewpoint, was not a nice process to withstand. It too was a trumped-up case and John treated it with the disdain it deserved.

John delivered the report in a manner which I was to become familiar with.; aplomb, sincerity and grace were hallmarks of his style, as well as being a brilliant orator. After a glittering career, plus two honorary doctorates for work relating to urban regeneration with a special focus on community youth, John took early retirement following the tragic death of his wife (well known for her development work with Oxfam). He went from being the busy head of Groundwork - a multi-million pound, cross-UK outfit - to mowing the lawn in front of his Cheltenham house and I could tell he was ready to find a new challenge. So I pressed him to help me ... and after giving it some thought, he accepted. From there we worked together very closely for more than a decade until his untimely death in 2011. He became my mentor, and though I introduced him to the field of Global Education in the United Kingdom – of which in characteristic style, he rose to be the chairperson - he taught me so much in return that I will be forever in his debt.

And I never fully understood why this happened. Beside John, I was a bit of a rough diamond, where he – despite a lowly background - was now the fine-cut product. He spoke the Queen's English, while my voice was tinged with Australian vowels: a shade more mellow than Crocodile Dundee, but indeed still quite noticeable. At first sight he was a daunting guy, big and imposing in stature who scared many people - me included - but when I got to know him, I found the best, most dependable friend in the world.

John was well known for two traits: he did not do detail, and he did not suffer fools. Thus, in my work alongside him, I was the one to make sure all the fine points were in place and I had to know what I was talking about. Once I got those two items straight, we were good to go. We turned out to be a well-honed team that was able to tackle a common challenge from opposing angles, resulting in a valid, composite solution.

He joined me in both Kenya and India, to help deliver major conferences, introducing me to The Farmer's Club in the backstreets of Whitehall and Lord Paul Tyler, over coffee at Portcullis House, along the way. He received an O.B.E. and I think, had he lived longer, would have received the Queen's sword. Sadly, that was not to be.

Once we had broken away from Rendezvous, John and I started up a unique tri-country programme at university level. It was part of a UK-wide initiative supported by the government's Department for International Development (DfID); our fledgling Cheltenham-based organization being chosen to deliver the England component. It was a step up to a new level: contacts in high places and enough funding to support a well-rounded programme. The University of Gloucestershire became our local partner, which too brought with it previously unknown credibility, while our newfound wealth enabled accommodation just near the centre of Cheltenham and well-qualified support staff.

For my partner and I, and our two beautiful girls, Cheltenham became home for more than a decade. We had jobs that paid modest salaries, but they involved work that we both enjoyed (arguably the more important aspect). The girls went to one of the best state-run schools in the country and from there onto London universities. In many ways the return from the southern hemisphere was a roaring success.

Cheltenham itself was a town of two halves: upper and lower. An interesting place to be domiciled because it encapsulated a good cross selection of British society. Waddon, a down-at-heel suburb and the place where we lived for a while after arrival, rubbed shoulders with Battledown, where I would often go jogging along gated-community streets, to look in awe at mansions which resembled castles. The High Street, like the whole town, was a street of two halves, named literally Upper and Lower. Our offices were situated appropriately, just off the somewhat seedy Lower section, while the other end housed fashionable boutique brands from Knightsbridge and Mayfair, in London.

The county of Gloucestershire was for me an absorbing work location, because of its diversity. Most people think of Gloucestershire as a privileged region, but some of the schools and their communities, which I used to deal with in the City of Gloucester itself, were far from prestigious; visit them and you leave with a very different impression of the county. Cheltenham is usually identified as upper-crust, but taken as one whole, that is also not true, while Stroud, the town which completes the county's urban triangle, is one of the most alternative, beer drinking, weed smoking municipalities in the country. I adored the friendliness of Stroud, much more than the other two.

The various programmes that we managed over the decade or so I lived there, reflected the diversity of the region, A project which focused on school gardens, for example, included tiny Cotswold village schools with fifty pupils, alongside massive town secondaries and then at least three schools which catered for the mentally handicapped. We ran another incredibly interesting little project that took Muslim women into schools, to speak with students and demonstrate aspects to do with their lives and their culture: dress, food, customs, etc. That was a project which very clearly reflected one of the main aims, which was all about helping people to understand different perspectives, even though it dealt with issues at home, on our doorstep.

Away from the work routine, Cheltenham brought some glorious new friends: men who fitted my usual template of strangely accented, boundary pushing characters, with untold charisma. One such was Pierre, who liked to claim he didn't have an accent, but in character and voice was almost as French as the day he was born. With craggy features, long greying hair and beard - leftovers from a hippie background in the 70s.- he still looked the part, but had sunk down the anarchic scale a tad, to become house-husband fighting like cat and dog over petty issues, with his very English wife.

I loved his devil-may-care attitude to life, with lurid gestures and loud raspberries in the direction of disagreement. He smoked brown-papered rollies and it was his habit to roll one, whenever he got behind the wheel of his early model VW Golf: red in colour, though like the owner, wearied by age into a pinkish mix. We would sit well into the night, on the concrete steps, overlooking his back garden - even during the bitter cold months of winter – for discussion on worldly affairs, fortified by inordinate quantities of red wine. He went not so much on taste, but alcohol content: 14% was good, 15% outstanding! Pierre was born to buck the system – verbally at least - and one day having just completed a PhD, announced on the back steps, that he would not complete the requirements requested by the viva panel. “Up their asses,” he said with his usual vitriol. “If they want me to make any more changes, they can go and fuck themselves!” ... all delivered in gloriously French-accented English, accompanied by numerous unseemly gestures and a series of very audible raspberries. And he stuck by his word resolutely, if perhaps a little foolhardily. A great friend and remarkable character.

Return to Britain also provided me with the opportunity to re-unite with close family in Cornwall: those whom I had run away from, more than thirty years before. This was moderately successful, with trips down to the South West, less often than should have been, and hardly any family doing the reverse trip, to visit myself and family in Gloucestershire. Although there had been short-term vacations since leaving for Australia thirty years before, by the time I came back to live it was all a bit too late; kids had grown into parents and a new brood was on the way. I was too far removed and too out of touch to re-assimilate in a complete sense. What I did find though, was that I was distant enough to be no threat, yet close enough to be trusted, meaning that family members used me as a sounding board, to help sort out their personal challenges. For that reason alone, it was well worth returning to the enclave of my upbringing.

During this Cheltenham Spa period I wrote a number of poems which related to family relationships. The verses below reflected abuse within the family, which was divulged, in confidence to me. The alleged abuser has since died.

Strange Revelations

*Everyone faces an unexpected word,
But a stranger revolution I have not heard,
Concerning family matters of a very trusted soul
Who had erred rather gravel just a few years ago.*

*Now my time (at 49) has brought a jolt or two,
But this disclosure came, like a bolt from the blue,
Casting further doubt on the sanctity at stake,
Of a tarnished family background over solid silver plate.*

*Concealments are made to test secrets that are held,
Their unveiling thus ensuring their concealers can be felled.
Bad trees in the forest, cleared away to make safe
The purity of life, in what seems a perfect place.*

*The falsity of this is so clearly there to see,
For innocent young saplings all make semi-rotten trees.
Some conceal, some expose, their less than wholesome parts,
But most (if not all), grow into old and wrinkled farts.*

*The choice thus remains for the new ones coming on,
To conceal or condemn the secrets they have won:
To keep momentum going or to cut and start again,
To support chronic anguish, or acute dose of pain.*
